Monumental Gall Displayed in Some of

Mrs. Harrison's Letters. MRS. M'KEE AND THE REPORTERS

Mrs. Grant owns that the eight happiest years of her life were those passed within the White House. Not all her predecessors and successors own to so much; for while there is the gratification of all pride and ambition for their lieges, there are many things that offset and make the cost of such a station. While every one approaches the White House family with deference, smiles and apparent friendliness, and say only kind and flattering things, all the undercurrent of unfriendly comment and critieism comes to them, too, in different ways.

"Anybody can do all the President's wife has to do and succeed," said a Cabinet officer's wife. "Everyone goes to the White House primed full of remarks, too, and there is always such a lot of people there that the President's wife only needs to say, 'So happy to have met you,' and 'Good morning' or 'Good evening' to them. Now, if she had to sit down and make conversation with these people, and return their calls and talk, then, too, she would have a chance to make blunders and do real work. The mistress of the White House says: "I wish people would not be afraid of me. There is nothing in my appearance to frighten or tongue-tie people, or never used to be; but half of the people who come are so embarrassed and excited that they do not seem to know what they are about, and one has not time enough in the crush to quiet them or put them at their ease." A FOREIGN LADY'S AWE.

The daughter of a foreign minister once said: "Whenever I go to the White House I have such a fright. My heart jumps out of my body when I get near the Blue Room. my voice fails, and I am almost unconscious of what I am doing until the greetings are past. Each time I see the President I am as nervous and frightened as the very first time I was presented to Her Majesty."

She told this to a Senator's daughter, who looked at her curiously and could not understand the English girl's inborn reverence and awe of a ruler; but scores of people excrience the same terrors. There are stories dent's oral library, and while they waited such an awful stage fright came upon them that they could only stutter and mumble a few words of their long arguments and take precipitate leave of the kindly and quiet man who was ready to listen to them.

The want of privacy is what President Harrison's family and past occupants have complained most of. The White House itself is as freely open and public as any public building in the city, according to the unwritten and inviolable law of custom. The publicity of the President's life increases with the growth of the American press. With each campaign and administra-tion more space in the papers is given up to the most intimate personal life and the daily doings of such victims. Their portraits are met everywhere, and every time the President turns around, or his wife changes her dress, it is recorded across the whole country. A file of old newspapers will show how recently and rapidly this personal chronicling has grown up, and past Presi-dents had a family and personal life of com-

MRS. HARRISON AND THE PRESS. "The papers tell you all more of ourselves saves us much letter-writing. I grew quite where more art and luxury are found in the tired of reading of the Harrisons during the finish and fittings. Much of the table campaign, and I hardly know how the country could have stood much more of it. I never before knew how great and good and complished I was, and if another one had taken up a pen I should have claimed the wings and mounted. I know all that my obituary could say."

"The press has been uniformly kind, almost too kind to us," said Mrs. Harrison a few days since. "I sometimes think though that the press has gone mad by the questions and richest country on earth.

Then a woman came out to Indianapolis to ask 'if the bustle should go,' Another one wanted to know if I thought that 'women should propose." A dozen have come and have written to ask which blossom preferred for the 'national flower.' Others have sought me out to know "if women are happy,' and 'what should be the age of the modern bride, and 'who should wear the decollete dress.' The patent underwear and the dress reform people come often. The last of all the conundrums was from some one mystified by the funny man's allusions in the newspapers who wanted to know if the President ate pie.' Yes, said the President, and I will appeal to the country on that issue and be Then the people who want cooking re cipes to print or to sell at their church fairs! They print them, and I read critical com ments from all parts of the country.' "And the crazy quilt people?" THE CRAZY QUILT CRANKS.

"You might as well shake a red rag at a bull as say crazy quilt at me. I thought the crazy-quilt rage was over years ago, but it seems to be at its height just now. write to me for scraps of my dresses by hundreds, and the census must be in the thous-ands now. Happy Martha Washington and Dolly Madison, with no one making erany quilts in their days! They send me squares of silk, and ask me to write my name on them and to get the ladies of the Cabinet families to do the same, and they scold me if I do not hurry about it, or if I decline, as I invariably do, without re-

The pensioners write to Mrs. Harrison to know why there is a delay in their getting their papers; and the people who address the President and receive no answer, or else a note from Private Secretary Halford, write to ask Mrs. Harrison to lay the subject before the President. In every such case, whether written or verbal, from oldest friend or anyone, the members of the President's family absolutely rejuse to prefer requests for offices or lavers to him. They se how worn and harassed he is with the all-day siege for offices, and they will not spoil his little rest or peace in the private part of the house by anything of that kind,

THE TEMPERANCE FANATICS. The temperance people call and write and exhort Mrs. Harrison as if she were an abandoned sinner, and they talk to her of Mrs. Hayes, and hold up Mrs, Hayes as an example until she must soon dread to hear the name of that good woman, who was in a way related to her. If there were an open bar in the White House some of the ex- 185 feet; brick boildings easy of change to suit horters could not be more auxious and earnest. The President and Mrs. Harrison, who purchaser; natural gas for fuel; plenty of are temperate in all things, have only fol-lowed established social usages, and set before their guests what is usual and proper. Every charity and every beg-ging scheme appeals to Mrs. Harrison, and three times the President's salary would not meet these requests. Actors and artists call and ask that the President's family will attend their per ormances, musicians and elecutionists and intant prodigies want to be heard in the White House parlors, and it is difficult to decline these kind offers that would result in so much benefit to these performers. All the cumulative methods of raising money for charities have been tried by asking Mrs. Harrison to send 10 cents or $1, and mail the inclosed blanks to 10 more people, who will keep on widening the circle of contributions by tens.

Mrs. Harrison's mail is a daily curiosity, as well as an infliction. The cranks in every part of the country write to her, and some of the letters pass beyond crankery. When the papers announced that the Whit House was overrun with ants, scores of recipes came for ridding the place of the pests, and in postscripts the writers sug-gested the rewards they would like for this voluntary kindness—a sum of money, a silk dress, or a postoffice.

RECEIPTS AND INSULTS. At the time of the rat invasion recipes for rat poisoning and packages of rat poison came daily. The letter writers are often impertinent. They advise Mrs. Harrison not to sign her name as Carrie, not to bang her hair, and not to become worldly-minded. The petitions for autographs and photographs are equal to the crazy quilt appeals. Anxious mothers ask her to make out a list of books that she would advise a young girl to read. Another mother wrote that her promising young son had dreamed that Mrs. Harrison had sent him a violin. The solution of the dream was in the postscript, of course, and provided for the dream's coming true by giving full directions for sending an express package to their country cross roads. Boxes of home-made candy, and cakes, pickles, and preserves are sent, requesting orders for the White House table and an opinion of their merits. A prize letter came from the South at the time of the holidays, and when deciphered read. President Mrs. Benjamin Harrison:

THE ECCENTRIC LETTER FILE. Of course four-fifths of Mrs. Harrison's mail goes straight to the waste basket, and not all of it even meets her eye, as those who attend to her mail know the signs of a crank intuitively. With the flood of such rubbish coming daily, it has to be an exceptional bit, a gem of crankery, that is saved for Mrs. Harrison's "eccentric file" of letters. Whatever the occupants of the White House have done in this and in past administrations, there is sure to be adverse criticism. The same people, too, who had so much fault to find when President Arthur changed the conchmen's livery to light drab, criticised when Mrs. Harrison made it dark green. President Grant was berated for driving four horses, and President Harrison gets it for driving one on his afternoon excursions to the suburbs. Those who never quit criticism because President Cleveland hedged himself in behind a sovereign's etiquette, and attended the dinners in none but the houses of his Cabinet officers, are displeased because President Harrison has reverted to the simpler republicanism of the

Dealing with the members of the press is a most difficult and delicate task. For the first few months after the nomination and inauguration the ladies of the tamily were simply looked at. The reporters wanted to see Mrs. Harrison and Mrs. McKee, and no third person could do. This being elevated to the level of something curious in a glass case, to be stared at face to face, was trying and not too flattering. Mrs. Harrison has gradually passed the interviewing department over to Mrs. McKee now, and her tact, patience and amiability have made editors, correspondents and reporters her friend.

MRS. M'KEE'S IDEA OF OFFICE. "I cannot see how anyone can have his head turned by elevation to a higher office," said Mrs. McKee, "You only have to live in Washington a very little time to see what it is worth, and the ups and downs of official life. If my head shows signs of being turned I hope my father will lock me

Imagination pictures the Presidental family as living on the pinnacle of splendor the papers tell you all more of ourselves than we know," wrote Mrs. Harrison to a friend shortly after the election; "but it almost offers more real comfort to its occupants, and there are a hundred houses turned, and the curtains patched. Mrs. Harrison says anxiously, "If we can afford new curtains this year," quite as if she were a housekeeper with a husband on a slender salary instead of the mistress of the White House, that has to be furnished and
